In 1952, the Bureau of Indian Affairs introduced its Voluntary Relocation Program, which promised to transfer Indians from a state of reservation impoverishment to urban American abundance. In this talk, Douglas Miller asserts that rather than passively fall victim to what often amounted to a catastrophic program, Native people impacted relocation’s outcome in profound and unexpected ways through their own initiative and resolve.