IMMIGRATION: DEPORTATION AND THE PSEUDO-SCIENCE OF UNASSIMILABLE PEOPLES

George A. Martínez*

I. INTRODUCTION

AMERICA is in the midst of an immigration crisis. Immigrants are now seen as a threat to Anglo-American culture.1 Military-like efforts are now being made to seal off the United States-Mexico border, resulting in thousands of deaths.2 In response to proposals to enact harsh immigration laws, immigrants took to the streets in cities across America in an effort to assert their civil rights.3 If the pressing immigration issues of the day are to be resolved, then scholars must participate in the discourse in order to help solve and illuminate the various complex issues. This symposium issue seeks to contribute to that effort.

In his classic work of social and political philosophy, Karl Popper argued that in order to progress from a “closed society” which is oppressed by “magical forces” to an “open society” which “sets free the critical powers of man,” then social policy must be guided and informed by “the critical and rational methods of science.”4 In this Essay, I seek to critically examine an important aspect of immigration policy. Recent events, including scholarly analysis and political action, raise the question of whether it is appropriate to direct deportation efforts primarily at Mexican and other Latino immigrants on the ground that such peoples are unassimilable.

In Part II, I describe how perceptions of Latino unassimilability appear to have led to deportation efforts being directed against Mexicans and Latinos. In Part III, I argue that this apparent deportation program should be rejected to the extent that it is based on the idea that Mexicans and Latinos are unassimilable peoples. In Part IV, I introduce the symposium papers.

II. THE BIG PICTURE: MEXICAN/LATINO IMMIGRANTS AND DEPORTATION

The issues are complicated, and an effort must be made to see how the pieces of the puzzle fit together to create a larger picture. In this regard, contending that the federal government has failed to adequately protect our country's borders, state and local governments are taking actions that significantly impact immigration. State and local governments are enacting laws or ordinances or are working closely with federal authorities to enforce immigration laws.

Consider some examples. In September 2006, the City of Irving, Texas, began using the federal government's Criminal Alien Program ("CAP"). Under the CAP, cities communicate with federal officials, who interview people who have been arrested by the local police and place immigration detainers on those suspected of being illegal immigrants. Since September 2006, the Irving program has turned over more than 1700 people to the Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") for deportation. The Irving program has been very controversial, and it has generated large protests. The Mexican Consul, Enrique Hubbard Urrea, has urged Mexican immigrants to stay away from the City of Irving and has accused the Irving police of improperly targeting Latinos.

Similarly, the State of Oklahoma has recently enacted some of the toughest immigration laws in the country.\textsuperscript{12} The Oklahoma law makes it a crime to harbor or transport illegal immigrants and to hire undocumented workers.\textsuperscript{13} This law too has generated a great deal of controversy and Latinos say that the law amounts to "ethnic cleansing."\textsuperscript{14} Since June 2007, the Tulsa police have turned over more than 500 people to ICE for detention and deportation.\textsuperscript{15} In addition, since the law was enacted, "Latinos have been leaving [Oklahoma] by the thousands."\textsuperscript{16}

Likewise, another Dallas, Texas suburb, Farmer's Branch, has attracted national and international attention for its recent crackdown on immigrants.\textsuperscript{17} The town's City Council enacted an ordinance which would impose fines on landlords who rent apartments to undocumented persons and would authorize local police officers to examine the immigration status of anyone arrested by police.\textsuperscript{18} Latinos also protested this action and the Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund has brought a lawsuit seeking to block implementation of the ordinance.\textsuperscript{19}

Because of this effort to enforce the immigration laws in the American southwest and elsewhere, record numbers of persons are now being deported from the United States.\textsuperscript{20} In fiscal year 2007, the government has deported more than 260,000 persons.\textsuperscript{21} In fiscal year 2006, the ICE stated that it had set a record for removals by deporting "nearly 195,000 illegal aliens from the country. . . ."\textsuperscript{22} Those deported are primarily from Mexico and other Latin American countries.\textsuperscript{23}

The events in Texas and Oklahoma—which involve a close working relationship between the local police and federal authorities—also provide us with an excellent example of the criminalization of immigration law. The criminal law enforcement system is being used to regulate non-citizens. As Bill Hing explains, those who pursue the American dream—those who come to this country to work—are now treated as criminals.

Why the crackdown on immigration at this time in history? Why are we seeing record numbers of deportations? In my view, in large part, the explanation is found in the popular fear that immigrants constitute a major threat to our national identity. For instance, Harvard University Professor Samuel P. Huntington gives voice to this concern. He argues that America’s core culture is Anglo-Protestant and that this is the essence of American identity. According to Huntington, people become Americans by assimilating to this Anglo-Protestant culture. Immigration of Latinos—especially Mexicans—poses a threat to Anglo-American culture. Because Mexican immigrants have allegedly failed to assimilate into American culture, our country could eventually turn “into a country of two languages, two cultures, and two peoples.” The Hispanization of America thus poses a threat to the “cultural and . . . political integrity of the United States.” He urges that immigration from Mexico be halted or greatly reduced.

Huntington has important allies. For example, Patrick Buchanan shares Huntington’s concerns about Mexican immigration. Because Mexicans fail to assimilate, he advocates “an immediate moratorium on immigration,” and the deportation and repatriation of Mexicans. According to Buchanan, this is necessary if we are to preserve our nation. He suggests that once immigration is resumed, we should only allow people to immigrate into our country who have a proven track record of assimilation into our culture.

These perceptions of Latinos and their associated deportation policy proposals are apparently now forming the basis for action in places like Texas. Deportation is the implementation of “a policy selecting those allowed to become and remain residents of the United States. . . .” In particular, we seem to be witnessing the deportation and repatriation of Mexican and other Latino immigrants. Significantly, one of the leaders of the immigration crackdown effort in Irving, Texas, Jean Towell, expressly argues that the Irving police practices are necessary to preserve American culture. Similarly, one resident of Farmer’s Branch, Texas, and representative of a group known as “United Farmer’s Branch” explained the new ordinance directed against undocumented persons by stating: “They’re afraid that Farmer’s Branch is becoming Hispanic.”

In effect, many decisionmakers appear to have decided that Mexican immigrants are unassimilable. Since Mexican immigrants are presumably unassimilable, the push toward deportation and repatriation intensifies. As stated, for the most part, deportation efforts are aimed at Mexicans and other Latinos. In this regard, a new survey shows that a majority of Latinos in the United States, including American citizens, are concerned that they or someone they know may be deported. When seen in the light of history, these concerns of even American citizens may not be far-fetched. During the Great Depression, approximately one million persons of Mexican origin were forcibly removed from the United States. Half of these persons were American citizens. During “Operation Wetback” in 1954, hundreds of thousands of persons of Mexican descent, including citizens and non-citizens, were deported to Mexico.

There is a certain amount of irony in these claims that Mexicans do not assimilate. The dominant society at one time rigorously enforced a racial caste system that sealed off and segregated Mexican-Americans from white society. With apparently no appreciation of this history, dominant society now complains that Mexicans fail to assimilate into Anglo-American society.

Recent work by theorists on the criminalization of immigration law explains the dynamics at work in contemporary immigration policy. In the context of criminal law, the so-called “new penology” features tough prison sentences and mass incarceration. The goal of the new penology is to manage criminals instead of rehabilitate them into society. Similarly, the goal of immigration policy is now to manage immigrants of color who are assumed to be unassimilable instead of incorporate them into society. Importantly, there has been “a rather complete convergence between the criminal justice and deportation systems.”

At the same time, immigration scholars have recognized that important aspects of immigration law have failed to incorporate criminal law norms. In particular, standard criminal law sanctions or punishments exist on a continuum and are designed to fit the seriousness of the crime. In contrast, immigration law imposes a single sanction—deportation—regardless of whether the infraction at issue is serious or not. As a result, “removal of long term residents from the United States for crimes of questionable seriousness is now commonplace.” Conventional immi-

Symposium on Immigration

Migration scholars seem puzzled as to why there are no graduated penalties in the immigration context and propose, quite sensibly, that there should be a range of sanctions. Despite this, immigration law has resisted the construction of a spectrum of penalties and has retained using removal from the United States, or deportation, as the sole sanction. Any confusion or puzzlement of the immigration scholars appears to arise from a failure to comprehend the larger picture. If the goal of the immigration system were to incorporate undocumented persons into society, then one would expect to see graduated sanctions in the immigration context. This would allow immigrants a chance to escape deportation and remain in the country. The goal of the immigration system, however, now seems to be to remove presumptively unassimilable persons who allegedly constitute a threat to American identity. Given this apparent goal, one would expect that a range of sanctions would not be incorporated into immigration law because that would make it more difficult to remove supposedly unassimilable persons who would undermine American culture.

Historically, other racial minorities have been excluded from America or denied the right to become Americans on the ground that they allegedly failed to assimilate into the core American culture. After the American Civil War, Congress enacted the Chinese Exclusion Act, which in effect halted immigration from China. In upholding the Act, the Supreme Court held that if Congress "considers the presence of foreigners of a different race in the country, who will not assimilate with us, to be dangerous to its peace and security... [Congress's] determination is conclusive upon the judiciary."

III. THE PSUEDO-SCIENCE OF UNASSIMILABLE PEOPLES

To the extent that this apparent deportation program is based on the theory that Mexicans and Latinos constitute unassimilable peoples, it should be rejected because: (1) it is based on a standard that would reintroduce de facto whiteness as a requirement for American citizenship; (2) it is contrary to moral and political principles of multiculturalism; and (3) it is based on a psuedo-scientific theory of unassimilable peoples.

I have argued elsewhere that to demand that we should only allow persons who assimilate into dominant American culture to become citizens is objectionable because it would reestablish de facto the old and now infamous requirement—which prevailed from 1790 to 1952—that only white persons could become citizens of the United States. It would re-establish the white person requirement because under the racial prerequisite cases which interpreted the criterion of whiteness, one established one’s whiteness by showing that one’s group could assimilate into dominant American society. Such a requirement is inconsistent with our modern sensibilities about race. Thus, one should reject the current deportation program to the extent that it is based on an assimilationist/whiteness standard.

The assimilationist/deportation program should also be rejected because it is inconsistent with the dominant political philosophy of our time—multiculturalism. According to multiculturalism, all cultures are of equal value. When one attempts to force another to assimilate into a homogenous culture, that violates the principle that all cultures are deserving of equal respect. Thus, one should reject the current deportation program to the extent that it is based on the idea that Mexicans and others are unassimilable peoples.

Even if it were appropriate to consider assimilation, the facts show that persons of Mexican origin assimilate. Latino immigrants learn to read and speak English. One recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center shows that approximately 90% of adult Latinos who were born in this country speak fluent English. Mexican-Americans have served with great distinction in the United States military. Indeed, leading Mexican-American organizations—for example, the League of United Latin American Citizens (“LULAC”)—have advocated assimilation, English language acquisition, American patriotism, and status as white.}

63. Id. at 38.
This is consistent with social science literature which "finds that Hispanics are in fact well 'assimilated' with most Latinos holding or sharing the same core values and attitudinal predispositions associated with democracy as other Americans."69

These facts, which contradict the narrative of Mexican unassimilability, seem to be irrelevant to the debate.70 They do not cause the theorists to withdraw their claims of Mexican unassimilability. What are we to make of this? A leading philosopher of science, Karl Popper, tells us that "the criterion of the scientific status of a theory is its falsifiability, or refutability, or testability."71 "A theory which cannot be refuted by any conceivable event is non-scientific."72 Since it would appear that nothing can count against these claims of Mexican unassimilability, these theories should be seen as nothing more than pseudo-science.

Popper offers examples of pseudo-scientific theories: astrology, the Marxist theory of history, and psychoanalytic theory.73 For example, Marxists would never accept any evidence as counting as a refutation of their theory of history.74 As a result, they undermined their "claim to scientific status."75 Similarly, with respect to psychoanalytic theory, there "was no conceivable human behavior which could contradict them." Thus, psychoanalytic theory is also revealed as pseudo-science. Popper views such pseudo-scientific theories as mythology—something like stories in Greek mythology.

Popper applies his ideas to social philosophy. Just as we should reject theories that are falsified in scientific research, we should reject social policies that cannot withstand critical scrutiny. The theory of the unassimilability of Mexicans and Latinos cannot withstand critical inquiry. It would seem that no facts can count against it. As a result, it should be seen as little more than mythology and rejected.

The highly questionable nature of these theories of unassimilability may be clearly seen when we consider the history of various peoples who have been wrongly declared unassimilable. For example, in rejecting a challenge to the Chinese Exclusion laws, the Supreme Court declared the unassimilability of Chinese immigrants:

The differences of race added greatly to the difficulties of the situation. . . . They remained strangers in the land, residing apart by themselves, and adhering to the customs and usages of their own country. It seemed impossible for them to assimilate with our people, or to make any change in their habits or modes of living. As they grew in numbers each year the people of the coast saw . . . great danger that . . . that portion of our country would be overrun by them, unless prompt action was taken to restrict their immigration.

In the infamous case of Korametsu v. United States, the Supreme Court concluded that it was permissible to place Japanese immigrants and Japanese-Americans in internment camps, in part because it found such per-

81. Interestingly, there appears to be a similar mythology at work which constructs immigrants as criminals. See Legomsky, supra note 24, at 500. Professor Stephen Legomsky has exhaustively reviewed the literature on immigration and crime and has found that "immigrants are more law-abiding than the native-born" and that there is an "absence of evidence that even undocumented immigrants are any more or less prone to crime than the native-born." It was this feature of their immigration, according to this view, that was most responsible for the misfortunes that were visited upon them.").
sons unassimilable.\textsuperscript{83} The \textit{Korametsu} opinion heavily relied on the rationale of \textit{Hirabayashi v. United States}, another case dealing with special treatment of persons with Japanese ancestry during World War II, decided a year earlier:

There is support for the view that social, economic and political conditions which have prevailed since the close of the last century, when the Japanese began to come to this country in substantial numbers, have intensified their solidarity and have in large measure prevented their assimilation as an integral part of the white population. In addition large numbers of children of Japanese parentage are sent to Japanese language schools outside the regular hours of public schools in the locality. Some of the schools are generally believed to be sources of nationalistic propaganda, cultivating allegiance to Japan.\textsuperscript{84}

Likewise, in \textit{United States v. Thind}, the Supreme Court refused to allow an Indian immigrant to become an American citizen because it found Indians to be unassimilable:

It is a matter of familiar observation and knowledge that the physical group characteristics of the Hindus render them readily distinguishable from the various groups of persons in this country commonly recognized as white . . . [I]t cannot be doubted that the children born in this country of Hindu parents would retain indefinitely the clear evidence of their ancestry . . . . What we suggest is merely racial difference, and it is of such character and extent that the great body of our people instinctively recognize it and reject the thought of assimilation.\textsuperscript{85}

The pseudo-scientific nature of these theories of unassimilability is clear. At this point in American history, it is beyond argument that all of these peoples—persons of Japanese, Chinese, and Indian origin—are all extremely important and well-acculturated members of American society.

\textsuperscript{83} \textit{Korametsu v. United States}, 323 U.S. 214, 219–24 (1944); \textit{id.} at 237–38 (Murphy, J., dissenting).

Given the extremely dubious nature of the various claims regarding the unassimilability of distinct peoples and the failure to accept facts as contradicting the current theory of the unassimilability of Mexicans and other Latinos, we should regard such a theory as pseudo-science—just a myth. To the extent that the current deportation program of Mexicans and other Latinos is based on pseudo-scientific theories regarding the alleged unassimilability of such peoples, it should be rejected. This is necessary if we are to achieve a truly open and rational society.

IV. THE SYMPOSIUM PAPERS

I turn now to consider the articles that appear in this symposium issue on immigration. In the foreword, Dean Kevin R. Johnson argues in favor of changing United States immigration laws so as to create “open borders” and eliminate “exaggerated border controls.” He offers a number of reasons in support of this proposal, including that (1) it responds in an appropriate way to the global economy; (2) it would bring an end to the current harsh immigration enforcement regime, and (3) the current system of immigration laws is unrealistic and unenforceable.

In the first article, Professor Howard Chang observes that economic theory recognizes that free migration of labor is likely to produce economic gains for all countries. Nevertheless, some economists support restrictions on immigration in order to shield native employees from immigrant competition. Professor Chang argues that such worries about the effects of foreign competition on native workers do not justify protectionist immigration policy. He contends that the tax system is able to provide an appropriate remedy for any concerns about native workers.

In the next article, Professor Nathan Cortez considers the appropriate role for states and local government in the immigration context. In particular, he examines whether “otherwise permissible state and local laws avoid preemption simply by referring to or relying on federal immigration standards.” He argues that relying on federal standards will not necessarily immunize state and local laws from preemption.

In the next article, Professors James Hollifield, Valerie Hunt, and Daniel Tichenor observe that industrial democracies like the United States are caught in a "Liberal Paradox." In order to compete in the global economy, such countries must be open to migration. At the same time, national security and political demands militate in favor of closing the borders. They note that United States immigration policy was fairly liberal from about 1950 to 1990. A more restrictive approach to immigration appeared in the 1990s. Despite this, another expansive era of immigration has continued to the present day. The authors argue that this expansion in immigration is the result of "both policy interventions and changing U.S. economic conditions."

In the next article, Professor Michael Olivas considers Professor Kris Kobach's arguments that the Development Relief and Education for Alien Minors ("DREAM") Act not be enacted and state DREAM Act counterparts be repealed. The proposed DREAM Acts would allow undocumented persons to receive in-state tuition at state universities. Professor Olivas argues, as against Kobach, that states may legally provide tuition benefits to undocumented persons and that it is appropriate to do so.

In the final article, Professor Rose Villazor explores the meaning of "sanctuary" in the context of immigration enforcement. She argues that sanctuary locations fail to offer real safety for immigrants.

In the first essay Professor Karen Engle offers analysis of the Olivas and Hollifield, Hunt, and Tichenor papers. In particular, she views them through a lens which considers "the extent to which political versus economic factors drive immigration."

In the following essay, Professor Teresa Miller argues that neo-liberal economic policies have led to a criminalization of undocumented immigration. She suggests that such economic policies have helped bring about the current uproar over immigration in the United States.

V. CONCLUSION

This symposium on immigration law and policy is an effort to bring reason to bear on some of the most important issues of our time. The papers generated by the symposium shed light on many issues and will help shape the debate in the area of immigration.
