1976

Houston Chronicle Publishing Co. v. City of Houston: Public Has Limited Access to Criminal Records

J. Graham Hill

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholar.smu.edu/smulr

Recommended Citation

This Case Note is brought to you for free and open access by the Law Journals at SMU Scholar. It has been accepted for inclusion in SMU Law Review by an authorized administrator of SMU Scholar. For more information, please visit http://digitalrepository.smu.edu.
After the city of Houston refused to release certain arrest records the Houston Chronicle Publishing Company sought a declaratory judgment in order to establish a statutory right of access to the documents under the Texas Open Records Act. The trial court denied the relief sought and the plaintiff appealed. Held, reversed: The media and the public have a limited right to review information maintained by state law enforcement agencies. Houston Chronicle Publishing Co. v. City of Houston, 531 S.W.2d 177 (Tex. Civ. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1975, writ filed).*

I. THE TEXAS OPEN RECORDS ACT AND INVESTIGATORY FILES

Recognizing that the public should be entitled to full disclosure of the affairs of state government, the Sixty-third Texas Legislature adopted the Texas Open Records Act. The Act provides a comprehensive scheme for public access to state documents. Fifteen classes of documents are termed "public" while sixteen categories are exempt from disclosure. Despite the exempt categories, the legislature clearly expressed an intention that the "Act shall be liberally construed in favor of the granting of any request for information." One exemption from public disclosure under the Texas Open Records Act provides that "records of law enforcement agencies that deal with the detection and investigation of crime" are not available for public review. According to the author of the Act this section was modeled after a provision of the Federal Freedom of Information Act. The primary purpose of the federal

---

* Editor's Note: After this Note was set in print the Texas Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion, refused application for writ of error, n.r.e. 19 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 300 (April 28, 1976).
2. Id. § 6(a).
3. Id. § 3(a). The state judicial branch is not included within the purview of the Texas Open Records Act. Id. § 2(1)(G).
4. Id. § 14(d). Upon written application by any person the custodian of the requested document must promptly produce the record for inspection and duplication. Id. § 5(b). Governmental agencies are authorized to charge reasonable fees for access to such records. Hendricks v. Board of Trustees, 525 S.W.2d 930 (Tex. Civ. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1975, writ ref'd n.r.e.). If a governmental unit determines that the requested document is confidential, the agency may within 10 days request that the Texas Attorney General resolve the dispute. Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6252-17a, § 7a (Supp. 1975-76). If no action is taken by the agency, the party desiring the record may seek a writ of mandamus for a judicial determination of the issue. Id. § 8. According to the court in Texas Indus. Accident Bd. v. Industrial Foundation of the South, 526 S.W.2d 211, 214 (Tex. Civ. App.—Beaumont, writ granted), the party seeking the mandamus must enter the controversy with "clean hands."
6. Texas State Representative Lane Denton addressing the Texas House of Representatives on February 13, 1973. Transcripts on file with the Texas Legislative Counsel.
7. The federal act, as originally adopted, provided for the non-disclosure of investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes except to the extent the information is available by law to a party other than an agency. 5 U.S.C. §§ 552(b)(7) law enforcement exception was to enhance the detection of federal statutory violations and protect the privacy of citizens being investigated or providing information to federal investigatory agencies. This exception, however, cannot completely abrogate the media's right under the first amendment to publish items of public interest or the public's right to be informed of governmental activities. Courts have a duty to strike a workable balance between these conflicting public policy precepts.

II. BALANCING THE INTERESTS

In applying the law enforcement exemption of the Texas Open Records Act the courts are faced with three basic policy considerations which are firmly rooted in the traditions of our society: (1) the state's right to secrecy, (2) the freedom of the press, and (3) the individual's right to privacy. These policy considerations do not operate in a vacuum. Judicial decisions often demonstrate that the state's right to secrecy or the individual's right to privacy can conflict with the freedom of the press. For purposes of analysis each concept is examined separately.

State Secrecy. As a practical matter government must operate behind closed doors in certain limited circumstances. A common law privilege of governmental confidentiality, therefore, has been recognized by the courts. In a criminal law context, for example, public disclosure of governmental activities regarding the detection and prosecution of criminal misconduct can frustrate effective law enforcement in at least three ways. First, if individuals engaging in prohibited conduct are cognizant of the time, place, and method of future investigations, the criminal justice system would be undermined.\(^\text{15}\) Second, criminal prosecutions are conducted in an adversary context. Accordingly, the legislative and judicial branches have established rules of confidentiality regarding records within the control of the state in order to promote effective prosecution.\(^\text{16}\) For this reason the Texas Attorney General has ruled that the Texas Open Records Act should not serve as an additional means of discovery in a criminal case.\(^\text{17}\) Finally, the courts have recognized that the state has an interest in preventing extensive press coverage when such conduct may prejudice the defendant's right to a fair trial.\(^\text{18}\)

8. Hawkes v. IRS, 467 F.2d 787 (6th Cir. 1972); Frankel v. SEC, 460 F.2d 813 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 889 (1972); Evans v. DOT, 446 F.2d 821 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 918 (1971).

11. See generally Z. CHAFFEE, FREE SPEECH IN THE UNITED STATES (1941); M. SHAPIRO, FREEDOM OF SPEECH (1966); Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment, 72 YALE L.J. 877 (1963).

12. James Madison declared, "A popular government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a Prologue to a Farce or a Tragedy; or, perhaps both." S. PADOVER, THE COMPLETE MADISON 377 (1953).

Freedom of the Press. Since the historic case of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan\(^\text{19}\) the courts have afforded the press a special legal status which promotes the free flow of information to the public and enhances "uninhibited, robust and wide open" debate of national issues.\(^\text{20}\) The Court has been less helpful with the specific right of "newsathering." In Branzburg
v. Hayes\textsuperscript{21} the Court recognized that "newsgathering" qualified for first amendment protection but held the privilege did not apply when newsmen were questioned before the grand jury concerning confidential sources.\textsuperscript{22} A further blow to the press was struck in Pell v. Procunier\textsuperscript{23} when the Court held that newsmen did not have a constitutional right of access to prisons or prisoners beyond that afforded the general public. Despite these cases one must not lose sight of the concept that a free press is an indispensable tool in assuring the essence of democracy: an informed electorate.\textsuperscript{24} This concept applies with particular vigor within the framework of criminal investigations and prosecutions which have consistently been classified by the courts as events of public interest.\textsuperscript{25} The media's reporting of such events, therefore, should fall within first amendment protection.\textsuperscript{26}

Privacy. The common law tort of privacy was first introduced in a law review article by Warren and Brandeis.\textsuperscript{27} This tort, as defined by Dean Prosser, involved four separate torts: (1) intrusion upon the plaintiff's seclusion or solitude, or into his private affairs; (2) public disclosure of embarrassing private facts about the plaintiff; (3) publicity which places the plaintiff in a false light in the public eye; and (4) appropriation of the plaintiff's name or likeness for the defendant's advantage.\textsuperscript{28} The intrusion\textsuperscript{29} and appropriation\textsuperscript{30} branches of privacy have been expressly recognized in Texas.

\textsuperscript{21} 408 U.S. 665 (1972).
\textsuperscript{22} Id. In a concurring opinion Justice Powell stated that the case was limited to grand jury testimony and that societal interests must be balanced on a case-by-case basis. Id. at 710.
\textsuperscript{25} See, e.g., Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975) (story of rape and killing of plaintiff's daughter); Williams v. KCMO Broadcasting Div.-Meredith Corp., 472 S.W.2d 1 (Mo. Ct. App. 1971) (broadcast of plaintiff's arrest).
\textsuperscript{26} See, e.g., Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967). In Hill the Court ruled that the states could not redress false reports of matters of public interest absent a showing that the defendant published with knowledge of the report's falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth. In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975), the Court rested its opinion on a narrower ground. The Court ruled that since the defendant had obtained the identity of the rape victim from judicial records, which were public documents, the disclosure was constitutionally protected. See generally A. Miller, Assault on Privacy (1971); A. Westin, Privacy and Freedom (1967).
\textsuperscript{29} Billings v. Atkinson, 489 S.W.2d 858 (Tex. 1973), noted in 27 SW. L.J. 865 (1973).
\textsuperscript{30} Kimbrough v. Coca-Cola/USA, 521 S.W.2d 719 (Tex. Civ. App.—Eastland 1975, writ ref'd n.r.e.).
The United States Supreme Court has held that privacy has federal constitutional dimensions. In the criminal law arena a government's informant as well as a party being investigated or accused of criminal activity must be accorded a right of privacy by the courts.

III. Houston Chronicle Publishing Co. v. City of Houston

The issue presented to the court of civil appeals was whether various investigatory records were public information under the Texas Open Records Act. The materials requested by the plaintiffs included offense reports, personal history and arrest records, police blotters, show-up sheets, and arrest sheets. On the effective date of the Texas Open Records Act all of the documents sought were available to the media with the exception of the police blotters. In January 1974, however, the city ceased to allow the press access to certain offense reports. The Texas Attorney General ruled that the name, address, and offense of each arrestee and the disposittion of each case should be released to the media. According to the opinion of the attorney general the city should cooperate with the press by providing additional information concerning police activities as long as the right of privacy of affected parties was preserved. To comply with this decision the city allowed the media access to the data but vigorously asserted a right to withhold the information at any time.

Justice Curtis Brown recognized that the resolution of the controversy involved a careful weighing of conflicting societal interests. The court first held that the media and the public have a constitutionally protected right of access to information concerning the detection and prosecution of criminals. This right of access, however, must be tempered by an equally compelling need for government secrecy and individual privacy. Justice Brown balanced these interests and expressed the view that the press should have access to all arrest records, police blotters, and show-up sheets. Public access was limited, however, to only the front page of the offense reports which included data such as the offense committed, the time and location of the crime, and the identities of the complainant and investigating officers. The court's conclusion was logical because a public event was involved and a revelation of such limited facts, therefore, constituted only a minimal invasion of privacy. Further, public access to this information certainly would not significantly retard state prosecution.

Other information contained in offense reports, such as statements by informants, confessions, and officers' opinions regarding investigations, should not under the court's holding be made available to the public. The dissemination of this type of data might severely hamper future criminal prosecutions. Similarly, personal history and arrest records which generally consist of an individual's past experiences within the criminal justice system were also ruled confidential. Justice Brown expressed the concern that a contrary holding might result in "massive and unjustified damage to the individual." The court was undoubtedly correct in this judgment. Although law enforcement agencies have an affirmative duty to collect all information related to potential criminal activities, investigative reports can unfortunately consist of hearsay, rumors, and other unreliable facts. As only limited efforts have been made to expunge or correct inaccurate data in investigatory files,\textsuperscript{54} grave injury would be inflicted upon an individual's reputation by allowing public disclosure of this type of material. The public often places an unquestioned credence upon information contained in an official public document.

IV. CONCLUSION

\textit{Houston Chronical Publishing Co. v. City of Houston} is an important case in Texas jurisprudence. Justice Curtis Brown of the court of civil appeals dealt with several complex and conflicting policy considerations. In an excellent example of judicial scholarship Justice Brown balanced these interests and ruled that the public had access to particular types of criminal investigatory records.

\textit{J. Graham Hill}