Occasionally letters are received taking issue, more or less vigorously, with some writing which has appeared in the Journal. It should be understood that the opinions and analyses found in leading articles are those of the authors. Comments and notes are usually written by student editors, and the responsibility for their quality lies with the writers and the supervising professors in whose teaching fields the subjects lie. In all instances the views expressed are asserted in good faith and on the basis of available legal materials.

Invitation is extended to our readers to submit suitable articles for publication. While the Journal by no means suffers any dearth of articles, the editors are on the lookout at all times for worthwhile and interesting legal writing. Variety is striven for, and occasionally well-written articles have been declined because the subject-matter has been treated in a recent issue.

We pause to extend our heartiest congratulations to Shepard’s Citations on the occasion of its 80th anniversary. Shepard’s Citations has added a new verb to the English language: "to shepardize." To shepardize a case means to exhaust all subsequent decisions for treatment of the case in question. As every lawyer knows, legal research is not complete unless Shepard’s Citations has been used. The Journal is appreciative of the research tool found in Shepard’s Citations and wishes for it continued success in the years ahead.
